Letter to the Editor Green groups in denial

22 February 2010

Rather than major Green groups getting together at a closed meeting to work on a strategy to fight climate sceptics, I believe these groups should instead look at the evidence, and realise that “the game is up”. There is no evidence that carbon dioxide is causing any measurable level of global warming.

What Green groups relied on was normal bad-weather events and fudged data, to give the impression that the planet is in crisis, hoping that people would be gullible enough to believe that every form of natural warming and cooling has been the result of “evil” humanity. Many people are now seeing through the exaggerations.

My question to Green groups is: “Will you continue to ignore the lack of evidence and continue to ‘run away from debates with sceptics,’” as James Norman of the Australian Conservation Foundation has admitted.

For the record, I am happy to debate any leader of the major Green groups on the climate issue at any time. We want “Truth Before Politics”.

The Climate Sceptics Party is also happy to receive funding from any legally-run company. Australian companies are gradually realising how devastating carbon dioxide reductions will be to the economy. We hope to explain how the Australian community has had the wool pulled over its eyes on many environmental issues.

The Climate Sceptics Party will launch a South Australian television advertising campaign on Channel 9 on 28 February.
